draft and various bodies interested in war food conservation, including the committee on food supply and conservation of the Connecticut state council of defense, have urged the step. Provest Marshal General E. H. Crowder has settled the question in the following manner: The mobilization of the drafted army to cantonneat camps is to take place by groups from each district, say 20 per cent, of the quota at intervals of two weeks. Those men who are needed in the district for harvesting are to file claims for temporary discharge on this basis with the district. vesting are to file claims for temporary discharge on this basis with the district exemption boards, which will send the claim on to the local boards with a note saying that the claim has been made and disallowed. This will furnish the local boards with information as to what men are needed for farm labor. The local boards will then refuse the claim for temporary discharge (unless in exceptional cases), but will postpone sending these men until the later calls, which probably will not come until the second or third week in September, when the most urgent need of harvesters is over.
